For this to be useful, the American (and other) people who are asked to participate in the surveys must be able to understand the survey questions. Unfortunately, this is not always the case. Bilinguals have contributed the same information to Canadian and American researchers, but the researchers have not been able to understand the responses. This is a problem that has been pointed out by the guidelines of the ethics committees in the US and Canada (Simpson et al., 1997; American Psychological Association, 1999).

The authors worked on a Society on Climate Change project at the University of Toronto. The project was to develop a survey instrument to assess the public's understanding of climate change and the evaluation of the project's progress. The project was funded by the Ontario Ministry of the Environment and the Ontario Science and Technology Advisory Board. The project was a part of a larger project on the public's understanding of climate change and the evaluation of the project's progress.
